Dear Chief Justice McLachlin:

I am responding to your kind invitation to attend the dinner on the occasion of the Canadian Judicial Council (CJC) meeting, taking place on September 17, in Toronto, which I happily accept. Regrettably, Ms. Nazanin Afshin-Jan will be unable to accompany me to the dinner.

I was also pleased to be invited to address the Council on issues of mutual interest, and I will plan to attend on the afternoon of September 17, 2014, as proposed. That said, as you are aware, the House of Commons is scheduled to resume sitting the week of September 15, 2014. Therefore, there remains the possibility that I may be unable to attend the Council meeting due to my responsibilities in the House. In that event, I will ask my Deputy Minister, William Pentney, to deliver remarks on my behalf.

I will ask my officials to work with CJC officials to finalize the details of my attendance closer to the event.

Yours sincerely,

MEMORANDUM FOR THE MINISTER

Meeting with the Right Honourable Beverley McLachlin, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada

ISSUE

This note provides background information for your introductory meeting with the Chief Justice of Canada (date, time, and location to be confirmed). Although an in-person meeting with the Chief Justice is among the first acts of every new Minister of Justice, it is more than mere protocol. It presents an opportunity on both sides to communicate high-level messages about key issues and concerns, and to set the tone of the relationship more generally.

BACKGROUND

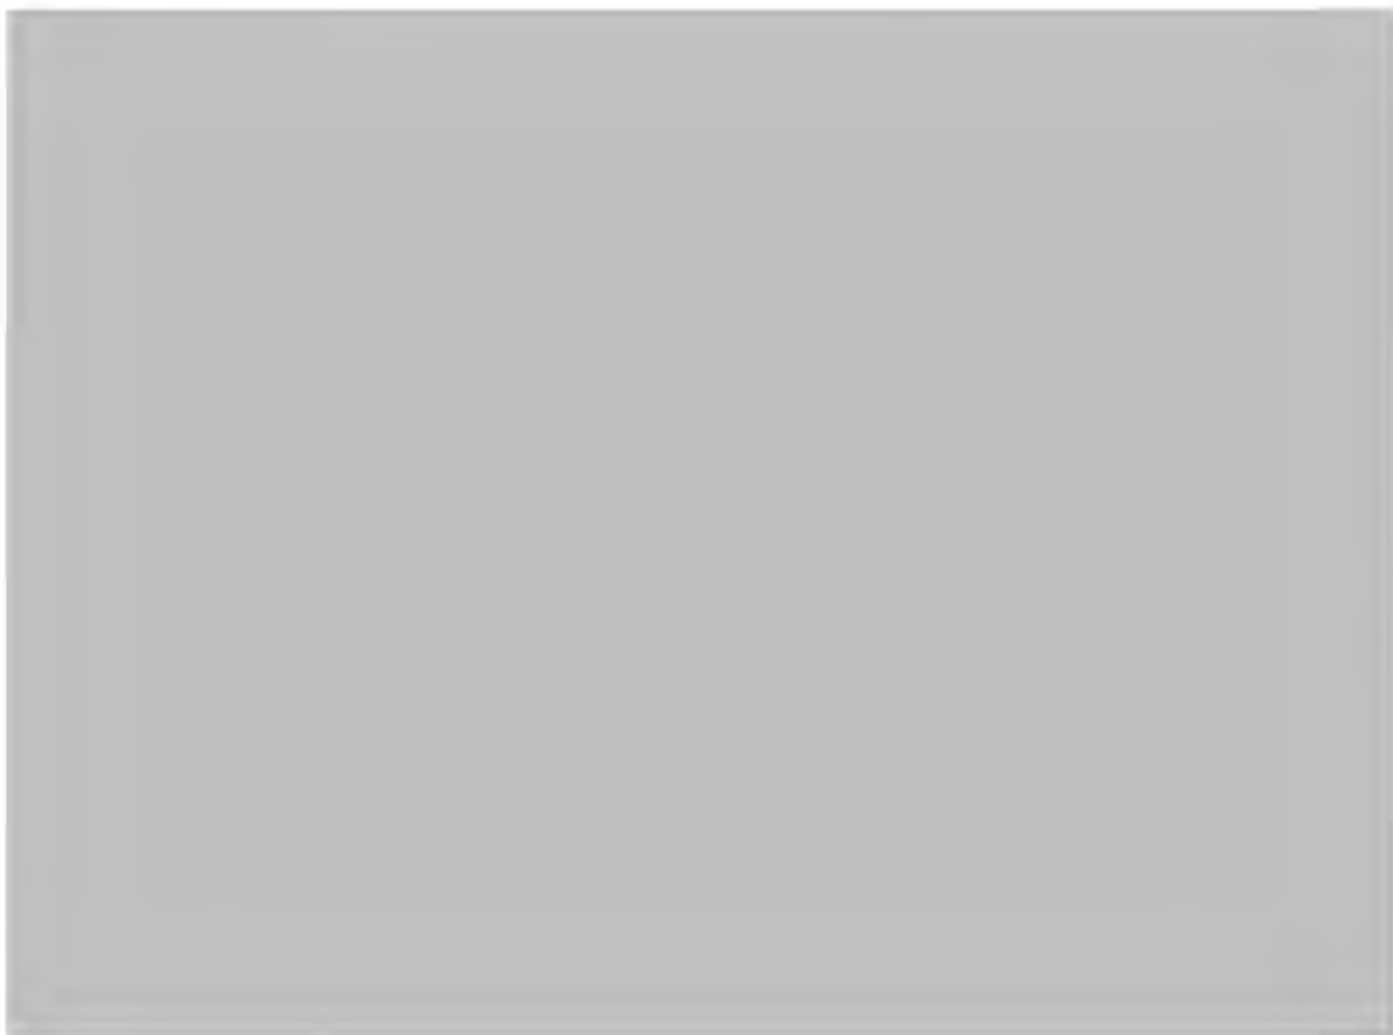

One of the core responsibilities of the Minister of Justice is to act as the primary interlocutor between the judiciary and the executive Government of Canada because of the constitutional separation between the three branches of government in Canada. Long-established practice requires that any communication between the Government and the courts be undertaken through the Minister of Justice. This ensures that dialogue is appropriately structured and takes into consideration the legal and constitutional framework—most notably, the principle of judicial independence—as well as policy considerations that pertain to the role and functions of the judiciary in Canada.

The Chief Justice of Canada acts in three essential capacities: first, she sits at the apex of Canada's judiciary and courts, providing both leadership and advocacy on behalf of the system as a whole; second, as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, she speaks on behalf of its needs, interests and unique role; third, she is Chair of the Canadian Judicial Council (CJC), a statutory body comprising all chief justices and associate chief justices in Canada, responsible for judicial discipline and for establishing policies on a wide range of other judicial matters. The Chief Justice may choose to raise issues in any of these capacities.

As Minister, you exercise parallel responsibilities. First, you play a stewardship role in relation to Canada's justice system, including the courts. You therefore share common (although not identical) interests and responsibilities with the Chief Justice in the fair and effective functioning of the system as a whole. Second, you have policy responsibility for statutes governing the federally-created courts, including the Supreme Court of Canada. This can give rise to the need for policy dialogue between the Minister and Chief Justice, including in relation to the courts' administration and the provision of the necessary budgetary resources. You also have lead responsibility for Supreme Court appointments.

Finally, you have important ministerial responsibilities arising from the Judges Act, which establishes the legal framework for the superior court judiciary, including judicial compensation and benefits. The Judges Act also establishes the Office of the Commissioner for Federal Judicial Affairs, which administers judicial compensation and benefits and provides the necessary budgetary support for the CJC. In the usual course, the Chief Justice invites the Minister to meet with all chief justices collectively twice a year on the occasion of the CJC's semi-annual meetings. This is an opportunity for the Minister, accompanied by the Deputy Minister, to discuss issues of mutual interest. In addition, the Chief Justice of Canada may from time to time propose a meeting to discuss issues of particular concern, although regular meetings between the Minister and the Chief Justice have not occurred in recent years.
